BLACKBURN, Joseph

Worcester –1787

Little is known of the origins of this painter whose portraits of Americans from around 1753 to the early 1760s are found in New York, Boston and Hartford. He was assumed to have been trained in a London studio because of his mastery of dress details. He was first recorded as a limner in Bermuda in 1752, and then in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Competition from Copley, whom he influenced, led to his seeking work beyond Boston after 1761, and he was in London by 1764. Oil portraits of British sitters (mainly in the south west of England and in Ireland) are found between 1764 and 1778. Research by the Worcester Archive Service in 2015 established that he was resident in the parish of St Nicholas from as early as 1768, and he was buried in that church on 11.VII.1787. He was the son of Joseph Blackburn of Kinver, Staffordshire who had moved to Worcester by 1745. No record of Joseph's birth has yet been found.

Blackburn was once thought to be responsible for a number of pastels in American museums, but no pastel is securely attributed to him. The signature that appears on one was thought by John Hill Morgan to have been forged, a view supported by the reappearance of the same signature and date on an quite different work; both pastels are evidently far earlier than the date (v. American sch.).
