HANDMANN, Emanuel Jakob

Basel 16.VIII.1718 – Bern 3.XI.1781

A pupil of Schnetzler in Schaffhausen (1735–39) and of Restout in Paris (1739–42); it is said that he then worked across France in partnership with Hörling (q.v.), with Handmann painting the heads of their portraits. A later but still rather inept example may be the 1752 portrait of Barbara Salome Steiger (known only from the surviving oil version) which places a head of the wrong dimensions and orientation onto a body copied from La Tour's pastel of the future marquise de Sesmains. Handmann then travelled to Italy, working with Subleyras in Rome, before returning to Switzerland in 1746. He made a further trip to Germany in 1753. In 1759 he travelled around Bern and Basel with Christian Georg Schutz and Johann Ludwig Aberli; he settled definitively in Bern, where he was a member of the academy.

Freivogel's 2002 monograph lists some 32 pastels which Handmann executed throughout his career. They are characterised by a warm, rich palette, and by an almost chiaroscuro lighting; his sitters are posed carefully, but statically, and they often wear exotic clothing and accessories which the artist depicts with relish. Their faces are bland or expressionless. The portrait of the blind mathematician Euler, which has decorated postage stamps, is a good example of the characteristic attention paid to the silk headdress and striped robe. This interest in accessories makes it unsurprising that he turned to the 1714 Recueil de cent estampes représentant différentes nations du Levant (assembled by M. de Ferriol, French ambassador to the Porte) for the inspiration for Esther Mutach-Steiger as la Sultane Reine.

Reifenstein (q.v.) reported to Caroline Luise von Baden (v.1761) that he had seen a pastel by Handmann fixed with the process invented by the celebrated pastel-maker Bernard Stupanus [Stoupan, q.v.] of Lausanne, involving an atomised mixture of strong vinegar and egg white.
