ROTARI, Pietro Antonio

Verona 30.IX.1707 – St Petersburg 31.VIII.1762
Rotari began his career in his native Verona, studying under Antonio Balestra and practising engraving, before travelling to Venice (1725–26), Rome (1727–30), where he was a pupil of Francesco Trevisani, and Naples (1731–34), where he studied with Francesco Solimena and continued as an engraver. After his return to Verona in 1734, he joined the Accademia Veronese, remaining for 15 years; here he commenced conventional and genre portraits, engraved as well as drawn, alongside religious engravings and paintings. From 1750 to 1756 he travelled to Vienna, where he was influenced by Liotard's pastels, and Dresden, where he developed his mature style of genre portraits. Lehninger noted his pastel portraits of the royal family in Dresden (only the oils seem to have survived) as well as his têtes de fantaisie, and mentioned his skill in chiaroscuro to rival Correggio. Rotari was also mentioned in correspondence between the comte de Wackerbarth and Marie-Maximilienne de Silvestre (q.v.), then in Versailles.

Rotari was invited to Russia by the Tsaritsa Elisaveta Petrovna and appointed court painter in 1756, remaining until his death six years later. Here he executed many more of these teste di carattere, portraits of young women, mostly in oils, with some pastel versions which seem never to be accurate replicas but rather permutations of the same elements.

A further source of confusion is the possibility that he copied Boucher's famous pendants of La Dormeuse and La Voluptueuse. It is impossible without examining each of these directly to decide whether any is correctly attributed to Rotari, and it is easy to see why the chic eroticism of these images might have suggested an entirely unfounded attribution to the Italian who worked in so similar a genre. However the surviving oil versions executed by Rotari for Peter the Great, although clearly inspired by the Boucher pendants, move further in terms of costume and handling than some of the pastel versions which have been ascribed to him, and these should all be treated as tentative attributions.

Mariette said that "le desir de plaire lui ont ... fait prendre une manière qui a du brillant, mais qui n'en a pas plus de solidité et qui n'est faite que pour jeter de la poudre aux yeux." Nevertheless he admired certain effects which made his compositions "piquants et assez intéressants". Technically Rotari seems to have experimented with mixed media, occasionally finishing oil paintings with touches of pastel applied over a coating of glass powder.
