SIXE, Louis-Antoine, chevalier

L'Aigle 1704 – Evreux 1780

Sixe (variously spelt Sixce, Sixet, Sixe) was the son of a painter, Antoine Sixe (himself the son of a painter) and his wife, Catherine Foucher; his grandmother Marie Colombel and his godfather, Louis Colombel, may have been related to the painter Nicolas Colombel. Sixe was a student of Jean-Baptiste Oudry in Paris, but was taken up by the duc de Bouillon, who appointed him peintre en titre and granted him an annuity of 400 livres in 1748; in the deed, he was described as “escuyer, chevalier de l'ordre du Christ et chevalier romain” suggesting that he may have spent some time in Rome, although there is no independent support for this. He lived in the rue du Fouarre in Paris before removing to the hôtel de Bouillon, quai Malaquais, and no doubt accompanied his patron the château de Navarre from time to time. Sixe's claim to nobility (which he did not inherit) allowed him to marry his daughter Marie-Aimée-Alexandrine to Jean-François de Crescent, a président-trésorier de France at Châlons.

Among his output were portraits in oil as well as allegorical scenes, animal paintings and altar pieces. A 1751 painting in the musée de Louviers is apparently copied from a print after Jean-François de Tory's Liseuse (Berlin, 1723). The single signed pastel (hitherto misfiled as by Chevalier) is reminiscent of the work of members of the Académie de Saint-Luc such as Vigée or Glain, and no doubt shows a character from the comédie Les Trois Cousines already known from representations by Watteau and others (and taken up again by Vigée the following year).
